

I am opposed to relaxing the entertainment decency standards in any way. As a person that does not use profanity, I already have a hard enough time finding anything to view without going overboard. I understand that our culture uses profanity to the point that it is almost common language. However, it is not common language to everyone. We already have lowered our standards in America to support every politically correct agenda out there. Lowering the entertainment decency standard are not what we should be doing. Try raising the standard and showing what we are capable of and not what we have fallen to. I already disagree with the amount of sex and sexual comments/suggestions on TV and the movies. Although "sex" may sell, so do wholesome values, comedy, and generally good entertainment. It is not necessary to lower our standards so that we more quickly indoctrinate our children into seeing and hearing things that minority view as normal. Not every household in America has a worthless father, a homosexual sibling or best friend, a hypocrite Christian for a grandfather, a lying husband, and a generation of profanity speaking people that only have sex on their minds.

Lowering the standards in the entertainment industry is a mistake. We need to stand up for decency and values and not play puppet to the politically correct elite.
